THE JEW'S TREASURE.

From Spare Moments "How came this young man here?" asked the Jew.

"How came this young man here?" asked the Jew.

There was a frown in his eyes that stared fixedly at Deborah from under a shaggy mane of gray hair escaping beneath the skull cap of faded velvet and hanging over the massive, willful brow.

"He came in to buy a book of ancient engrayings," answered the girl. "He said he was a painter, my father.

She stood on the inner side of the small counter, her blood-red head in relief against the rows of dusty old volumes in their mellow, brown, worm-eaten bindings. The light was dim in the little shop. The air was full of the faint, acrid odor that comes from old books, old parchments, old manuscripts. She was the most beautiful girl in Vietna, Miss Deborah, the daughter of the old Jewish keeper of the ancient bookshop in which bibliomarinaes had found treasures that had made his name famous among the clan half over Europe. With wealth if was rumored) and with this unrecognized celebrity, the old Jew had never moved his place, had never changed his mode of He. Naught cared he for the world of its estimates. One pearl of great price, he had, guarded with Jealous avarice—his daughter. Tall and straight as a palm on Lebanon she was, with a throat like milk and a mouth like "the scarlet thread" of the singer of the Song of Solomon, Her hair had caught the light of sunset and emeshed it forever. Her eyes were soft and dark and fathomless, like deep, still wells in which you see one star shine by night.

But Deborah had no suitors. Would her boauty fade unnucked like the rose of the song of like the rose and responsible methods.

wells in which you see one star shine by night.

But Deborah had no suitors. Would her beauty fade unplucked, like the rose on the bush? No man's shadow might linger across the threshold of the old Jew's shop. Let them puremase their wares, transact their business and be gone. His daughter was not for profune eyes to dwell upon, for Jew or Gentile to covet.

"And has this young man not been twice, thrice, here in a few days!"

Like arrows the small, piercing orbs darted their inquiry across the counter.

"Twice only, my fauther. The engravings made not a full collection the first time."

Phone 28

made not a full collection the lirst time."

Deboran's eyes met the father's and qualled not. An instant more of merciless scruthy and the old man, with a guteral sound of admonition, turned away. "Hall to me! Bring forward your congratulations!" at the same hour cried a young man, fair and pale, whose artist's garb of velvet jacket and soft hat had been exchanged for a glittering uniform of Hussars. "I have made headway. This cliadel is not impregnable."

"No citadel is likely to be that where your royal highness is concerned." said the same tones of the confidential friend and courtier.

"Beb! Who known?"

Sak! Who knows? A good general is he who foresees defeat and its consequence, as well as victory. And the old Jew is an enemy worthy of all one's strategy. To foll him would not be an easy task, even when I have won the daughter to my side. But she is worthy of every risk. Te gods! I have seen no such beauty as this girl anywhere. She could not be matched from palace to hovel in all the empire."

"Indeed no. This Deborah is a beauty of beauties; your royal highness says truly. There is none like her."

The next time it was the confidential friend and courtier who sought the old bookshop, and who, from the other side of the counter, managed, between two phrases relative to the purchase of a motheaten pamphhet of price, to allude to his comrade, the young painter.

"Consumed, alias! poor fellow, by the most sudden, the most tragic of passions."

A fluttering of the eyelids, a deeper flush of rose out the check. To the heart of the jew's daughter, a heart hitherto without knowledge of its own pulses, had come the revelation of quick, tumultuous throoks. The deep sleep that had visited her pillow hitherto, unbroken by dreams, grew fitful and haunted with visions.

Love was rising in her woman's bosom as the sap rises in the tender young twing of series.

nitherto, unbroken by dreams, grew fifting and haunted with visions.

Love was rising in her woman's bosom as the sap rises in the tender young twigs of spring.

The prince indeed appeared to be seriously enamored of the fair Jewess. He even created a scene at a fashlonable gathering which he attended. One of the gentlemen present took occasion to mention the beauty of Vienna, adding some sneering reference to the character of the Jew's fair daughter. The prince forgot his courting the bewilderment of the assembled company. From this time, of course, the prince's latest attachment became the talk of the town.

The old Jew went his way among his European correspondence with savants and bibliophiles, and famous book-worms, among his rare collection, his microscopic.
